1. The 1952-53 training schedules for units of the Czech armed forces were taken from a publication entitled Combat Preparation (Bojova Priprava). The book was published by the Ministry of National Defense late in 1951, and carried the signature of the Defense Minister, Dr. Alexej Cepicka. It was classified Top Secret, about 800 pages in length, and covered with red limitation leather (with the title, "Combat Preparation", printed across the top). The book was used as a guide for all units of the Czech armed forces, and contained the official military doctrine, with all rules, regulations and material for political indoctrination, as prescribed by the Ministry of National Defense. It was distributed down to battalion level. By referring to the outlines in the book, regimental and battalion commanders were able to make out training schedules for their own units. 4. Combat Preparation was divided into three major sections, each covering a four-month training period: Winter, Summer and Fall. Each of the sections had subdivisions containing training programs for each branch of the service, giving the training outline and number of hours for each subject.
